

I recently had my information stolen off my computer. I tried to get anyone I could interested--I had to change all my credit card numbers and bank account numbers, etc. No one cared or would even listen. So, I did some self-investigation. To make a long story short, my research took me to specific sites. I did a lot of looking into yahoo and when researching, found that they were associated with a large agency that tracked info on computers--illegally. I got into the Yahoo pipeline somehow and found some threatening notes (in Italian) to Yahoo from their customers there for invading their privacy. Further research lead me to CNN and an article on their site--the only one in German concerning the senator in NY and a couple of others who were looking into various internet problems. I had clicked on the CNN article and it took me to a German site--World Web. On it, my binanary computer number was displayed along with a notice in different languages, that said, (I believe this is correct, because it was in about 5 different languages), if I wanted to speak within the next week, I should click on an MCI site!!! Now, it could have been an advertisement, but why would they put my computers binary number on the site--it was a little erie!!!

Anyway, I don't trust Yahoo or MCI and have been doing more research into them since.

PS I no longer use my old computer on the internet!!!
